Luckily, in Bahrain we have a more realistic handle on our work-life balance. A recent news item declared that there are 17 public holidays in the Kingdom's 2025 calendar. Now this may seem a brief break compared to other countries - Nepal has the highest number of public holidays at 35 per year – but on a daily basis, Bahrain's labour conditions are sensible, rewarding and designed to take into account life responsibilities. Women, for example, get extensive maternity breaks after childbirth and even "lactation" time out where they can leave early for breastfeeding schedules. When close relatives pass away, employees get a three-day mourning pause in their work days. Our working day has a generous lunch gap where most private sector employees re-connect with family halfway through the working day. Government offices wrap up by 3 p.m. so that a sensible amount of the day is still left for personal life.

And that's the way we like it! We have a growing leisure industry and Bahrain's thriving restaurant sector would be crushed if we robbed them of their customers by putting everybody's nose to the grindstone for a terrifying 90 work hours a week, 7 days

A balanced life means a good mental health perspective and better creativity. In my opinion, that's a win-win all round.
